

HAL
open science

Hungary and Poland's anti-democratic turn: a new era or more of the same?

Jan Rovny

► To cite this version:

Jan Rovny. Hungary and Poland's anti-democratic turn: a new era or more of the same?. 2016.
hal-01295781

HAL Id: hal-01295781

<https://sciencespo.hal.science/hal-01295781v1>

Submitted on 31 Mar 2016

HAL is a multi-disciplinary open access archive for the deposit and dissemination of scientific research documents, whether they are published or not. The documents may come from teaching and research institutions in France or abroad, or from public or private research centers.

L'archive ouverte pluridisciplinaire HAL, est destinée au dépôt et à la diffusion de documents scientifiques de niveau recherche, publiés ou non, émanant des établissements d'enseignement et de recherche français ou étrangers, des laboratoires publics ou privés.

LSE

THE LONDON SCHOOL OF ECONOMICS AND POLITICAL SCIENCE

EUROPP

European Politics and Policy

Hungary and Poland’s anti-democratic turn: a new era or more of the same?

Reforms affecting the independence of courts and the media in Hungary and Poland have received significant attention in recent months. But to what extent do these developments constitute a genuine shift in the nature of Hungarian and Polish politics? Jan Rovny writes that while both countries have witnessed a rise in support for parties with anti-democratic tendencies, the dynamics of party competition remain consistent with the liberal-conservative political divide that has characterised the politics of these countries since the fall of communism.

Hungary and Poland have recently witnessed constitutional changes that have limited the independence of courts and the media. As these developments attract international attention, they beg the question of whether the politics of eastern Europe is being fundamentally altered, and the democratic achievements of the region reversed. My research suggests that while the recent changes in Hungary and Poland are a cause for concern, they do not represent a departure from traditionally entrenched contests within these societies. Instead, the current politics of Hungary and Poland continue to replicate, and even deepen, historical political divides.

Hungary and Poland: A new era or more of the same?

In a recent study, I illustrate that the main political divide in Hungary and Poland is one that combines economic preferences together with general socio-cultural visions of society. In both countries, reformed ex-communist socialist parties (MSZP in Hungary and SLD in Poland) initially coalesce with liberals around socially-liberal, pro-market policies, while deepening their countries’ cooperation with western partners, particularly the European Union. These forces are consistently opposed by traditional, conservative, nationalist, and generally protectionist opposition.

In both Hungary and Poland, this core divide has been present since the early 1990s, and remains unaltered, even as it witnesses a flux of party organisations on either side. First, the original liberal parties in both countries – that is the Union of Freedom (UW) in Poland, and the Alliance of Free Democrats (SzDSz) in Hungary – lost parliamentary representation, only to be replaced by similar socially-liberal political organisations in later elections, such as Your Movement (RP) in Poland, and Politics Can Be Different (LMP) and other minor formations in Hungary.

Second, the socialist parties (MSZP in Hungary and SLD in Poland) in both countries suffered significant electoral setbacks – largely due to corruption scandals – which strengthened the conservative pole of the political divide. In Hungary the great electoral beneficiary has been the conservative nationalist Fidesz party. In Poland, the collapse of the socialists focused competition on the contest between the liberal-conservative Civic Platform (PO), which takes up the liberal pole of Polish politics, and the conservative nationalist Law and Justice (PiS).

Third, in both countries minor radical nationalist parties – such as the League of Polish Families (LPR) and Self-Defense in Poland, and the Justice and Life Party (MIEP) in Hungary – have given way to electorally more powerful organisations. In the case of Poland, Law and Justice has come to represent the nationalist pole, while in Hungary, this pole is represented jointly by the radical Jobbik, and the governing Fidesz.

Figure: Visual representation of the Hungarian and Polish party systems (2014)

Note: The positions of the parties are determined using the Chapel Hill Expert Survey (2014)

The figure above demonstrates the extent to which the current party systems of Hungary and Poland replicate the same pattern. It plots major political parties (with a vote share over 3 per cent) based on their economic left-right, and their social conservative-liberal stances. Clearly the main divide in both countries runs over socio-cultural, rather than economic issues. In both countries we see a cluster of socially conservative parties (Fidesz and Jobbik in Hungary, and PiS and SP in Poland), opposed by a more-less cohesive cluster of socially liberal parties that do not differ much on their economic positions.

Consequently, despite a number of dramatic shifts in terms of party organisation and governing coalition options, the key divide in both Hungary and Poland remains intact. This is an important finding, further supported by ongoing research I am conducting with Jonathan Polk, as it underlines the fact that even when political parties have a weak organisational basis, as is typically the case in eastern Europe, they nonetheless tend to represent stable political divides and electorates. Although they come and go, they replicate stable patterns of political competition.

What then has changed in Hungary and Poland?

The key change in both countries has been the continuous weakening of the socially-liberal pole of the main political divide, coupled with increasingly bold assertions of conservative nationalism from the opposite side. Since the electoral undermining of socialist parties, the liberal bloc in Hungary contains a multiplicity of weak organisations struggling to form an effective anti-Fidesz coalition. In Poland, the liberal-conservative Civic Platform (PO) is under pressure from the conservative Law and Justice (PiS), the minor liberals, as well as from anti-system populists.

Simultaneously, the politicians of the conservative pole in both countries are pursuing further goals on the liberal-conservative divide with greater confidence. Shifting away from simply championing conservative values in the current political framework, the Hungarian and, more recently Polish, governments are reformulating their political regimes by enacting legal changes deemed as limiting the independence of constitutional courts, and of the media. The Prime Minister of Hungary, Viktor Orban, whose tactics have been closely observed by the current government in Warsaw, argues for the need to “construct a new state built on illiberal and national foundations”.

Finally, the conservative pole in both countries has been strengthened by the migration wave, which saw hundreds of thousands of refugees arriving in Europe from primarily Syria and Afghanistan in 2015. As many unregistered migrants passed through Hungary on their way to Germany and Scandinavia, Viktor Orban seized the political opportunity by sealing the Hungarian-Serbian border, and by vocally criticising immigration, as well as European Union plans to resettle the refugees throughout the EU.

The 2015 Polish election took place in the context of this migration wave, giving the opposition Law and Justice (PiS) party the opportunity to criticise the incumbent Civic Platform (PO) for accepting EU refugee quotas. Thus, the conservatives of both countries profited from this exogenous shock by integrating the political issue of immigration – a hitherto novel issue in Hungarian and Polish politics – into the existing liberal-conservative divide, and taking a vocal position on it.

The significant changes that have occurred in Poland and Hungary amount to worrying attempts at the hollowing out of liberal democracy, and the fueling of xenophobic nationalism. These changes are, however, taking place within the historical liberal-conservative political divide which has shaped the politics of these countries over the last quarter of a century. Despite the rise of various political organisations, and despite the increasingly anti-democratic character of the conservative political camps, as well as the increased salience of immigration, the core political division in Poland and Hungary remains stable.

Please read our comments policy before commenting.

Note: This article gives the views of the author, and not the position of EUROPP – European Politics and Policy, nor of the London School of Economics.

Shortened URL for this post: <http://bit.ly/1LSSbSm>

About the author

Jan Rovny – Sciences Po / University of Gothenburg

Jan Rovny is an Assistant Professor in Political Science at the CEE and LIEPP at Sciences Po, Paris, and at CERGU at the University of Gothenburg. His research concentrates on political competition in Europe with the aim of uncovering the ideological conflict lines in different countries. He is also one of the principal investigators of the Chapel Hill Expert Survey. He has published in World Politics, Party Politics, European Union Politics, European Political Science Review, East European Politics and Societies and elsewhere.

Share this:

+ Share / Save

March 2nd, 2016 | current-affairs, EU Politics, Jan Rovny | 3 Comments

Previous post

Next post

3 Comments

Leto March 2, 2016 at 9:25 pm - Reply

anti-democratic = liberals don't like it

zygmunt March 3, 2016 at 5:03 am - Reply

This article is ideologically driven. PIS is not a nationalist party. PiS introduced a welfare scheme that is more generous than that of Norway.

Elizabeth March 3, 2016 at 11:22 pm - Reply

The problem with the West that you are self-righteous, superficial and hypocritical. You call Central and Eastern European countries undemocratic when their governments are not social-liberal and/or do not let your countries to exploit them unscrupulously (free market economy – privatization – profit making). In other words, the West does not tolerate their desire for self determination and independence. They have to obey and play according to Western rules, even if often it is against their own (economic) interest. You also call these countries ‘nationalist’, meanwhile in practice you are more nationalist than those people (i.e. British-Brexit, USA). The only difference that you call yourselves ‘patriotic’, it sounds better. Do you ‘worry’ about democracy? In your countries democracy is a nice notion, nothing else, not even in the UK (i.e. lying about the Iraq war, bombing Syria without parliamentary approval) or in the US (i.e. lobbying – elections). You worry about free media too (a nice notion again), although, in your countries it does not even exist, for example, BBC or ZDF (in Germany) are not neutral at all or I can mention the deal between Murdoch and Blair. Lying and manipulating freely without any legal consequences and dividing people, this is what your ‘free media’ does (i.e. did in Hungary under the socialist government). Media freedom = dominance of social liberal ideas or spreading the word of the West. If the media is being regulated strictly (it is necessary!), you immediately start worrying about freedom. Xenophobic nationalism? What the heck is that? The British colonized a quarter of the world with brute force. You ruined millions of lives and created several failed states. Your master, the USA too. You went to Iraq and murdered hundreds of thousands of people for selfish reasons, therefore, you are responsible for this mess in the Middle-East. You also helped to build a fence in Calais because you do not want ‘refugees’ and other migrants to ‘invade’ your country illegally. No one can know who these people are. However, you condemn poorer Central and Eastern Europeans for worrying about them and doing the same? In addition, this is one of the reasons why you want to leave the EU. On this basis people are racist in the UK too.....and so on. You should ask sometimes questions. What happened? Why do they do this and that? What are their reasons? You do not really care what lies beneath the surface, do you? As a researcher you work for someone (for money) and you do your best to satisfy your master. You are also driven by your own conviction. In other word, you present your and your master’s views as ‘facts’. It is a shame and not science.

Leave A Comment

Notify me of follow-up comments by email.

Notify me of new posts by email.

Supported by the LSE’s European Institute

Recent

EUROPP Social Media

Follow EUROPP on Twitter

My Tweets

LSE BrexitVote Blog – informing the debate on UK’s EU referendum

EU Events Calendar

Click here for this month's upcoming EU related events

Commentary on Europe

▫ Agenda Pública

▫ BlogActiv.eu

▫ bloggingportal.eu

▫ Bruegel

▫ Carnegie Europe

▫ CEPS Commentaries

▫ Charlemagne's Notebook

▫ EU Energy Policy Blog

▫ Eudo Cafe

▫ Euro Crisis in the Press

▫ European Council on Foreign Relations

-
- European Parties Elections and Referendums Network \(EPERN\)

 - European Public Affairs

 - Europedebate.ie

 - FRIDE

 - Greece@LSE

 - Hertie School of Governance blog

 - Ideas on Europe

 - Lost in EUrope

 - LSEE – Research on South Eastern Europe

 - Politics in Spires

 - Polscieu

 - Social Europe Journal

 - The Forum of European Citizens

 - UCL SSEES Research Blog
-

Archive

Archive Select Month

Visitors yesterday

1,805	Unique Visitors
-------	--------------------

Powered By  Analytics

Visit our sister blog: LSE USAPP blog

LATEST LSE PODCASTS

[From a Culture of Connectivity to a Platform Society \[Audio\]](#)

March 7, 2016

[The EU: friend or foe for progressive politics \[Audio\]](#)

March 3, 2016

[Managing Europe – What is Germany's Responsibility? \[Audio\]](#)

March 3, 2016

[A Question of Law and Wealth \[Audio\]](#)

March 2, 2016

[A Question of Law and Wealth \[Video\]](#)

March 2, 2016

[The Evening After the Night Before: analysing Super Tuesday \[Audio\]](#)

March 2, 2016

[Panama: consolidating democracy, growth and human development \[Audio\]](#)

March 2, 2016

[Blood Oil: tyrants, violence and the rules that run the world \[Audio\]](#)

March 1, 2016

[Blood Oil: tyrants, violence and the rules that run the world \[Video\]](#)

March 1, 2016

[Darwinism and the Social Sciences \[Audio\]](#)

February 29, 2016

Visit our sister blog: LSE Impact of Social Sciences

FORTHCOMING EVENTS AT THE LSE

Ana Gogava (piano)

Climate Change and Laudato Si': the relevance of Pope Francis' call to save "our common home"

Climate Change and Laudato Si': the relevance of Pope Francis' call to save "our common home"

EVENT RESCHEDULED: From a Culture of Connectivity to a Platform Society

Too Important to Fail: humanitarian financing in a more fragile world

How to Boost Growth as the Oil Price Falls: transformation and reform of the Norwegian economy

Why Some Contentious Movements Fail: the case of the Syrian opposition

Each Age Gets the Inequality it Needs: 20,000 years of hierarchy

The Politics of Spatial Inequality in Metropolitan America

What Are Prisons For?

Visit our sister blog: LSE British Politics and Policy

LATEST ARTICLES FROM BPP

The ‘Snooper’s Charter’: you can’t deny message encryption to some individuals without denying it to all

March 9, 2016

The government’s own numbers show that alcohol is under-taxed

March 9, 2016

Freedom of expression on the internet needs to be weighed against social responsibility

March 8, 2016

Choice and control: social care must not disable people with intellectual disabilities

March 8, 2016

Charity under pressure: cash, credibility and consumerism

March 7, 2016

Words matter: deconstructing ‘welfare dependency’ in the UK

March 7, 2016

Book Review: Angry White People: Coming Face-to-Face with the British Far Right by Hsiao-Hung Pai

March 6, 2016

‘Too close to call’? Accounting for satisfaction with party leadership would have helped better predict the General Election

March 5, 2016

Instincts vs. Politics: the state of Labour’s fiscal debate

March 4, 2016

Council estates: why demolition is anything but the solution

March 4, 2016

Visit our sister blog: LSE Review of Books

 LATEST ARTICLES FROM LSE RESEARCH ONLINE

Taming the Basel leverage cycle

March 9, 2016

Organising the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions movement: the case of the ‘We Divest’ campaign

March 9, 2016

Unpacking ‘OVC’: locally perceived differences between orphaned, HIV-positive and AIDS-affected children in Zimbabwe

March 9, 2016

How insurance can support climate resilience

March 9, 2016

Consultation response: ‘reforming the business energy efficiency tax landscape’

March 9, 2016

Beyond the targets: assessing the political credibility of pledges for the Paris Agreement

March 9, 2016

Letter to Congressman Lamar Smith in regard to the testimony given by Dr Bjorn Lomborg to the House Committee on Science, Space, and Technology

March 9, 2016

Effects of digital engagement on the quality of life of older people

March 8, 2016

Positive behavioural support in schools for children and adolescents with intellectual disabilities whose behaviour challenges: an exploration of the economic case

March 8, 2016

Capter et transferer le savoir incorpore dans un geste professionnel

March 8, 2016

